A diagnosis can change a life, for better or for worse. It can lead to isolation, but also to support. The future trajectory of a life after a diagnosis is an unknown path, but one that we each have the individual power to shape.

No truer is this sentiment than in the midst of an HIV/AIDS diagnosis, faced with choices: the choice to disclose, the choice for treatment, the choice to withdrawal, the choice to fight, the choice to despair, and the choice to hope.

In an oil pastel piece produced by artist Brooke Whitfield, entitled Let’s Stand, Whitfield brings to life the journey of HIV/AIDS through the medium of song. Drawing on inspiration from Tom Phillips’ Humument project in which painting, collage, and other word removal techniques are used; Whitfield transformed the song Alone by Philly Lutaaya into an original piece of art.

During an interview with the artist, Whitfield stated that she drew inspiration for her piece selection from Tom Phillip’s quote: “I have yet to find a situation, statement or thought which its words cannot be adapted to cover” (Phillips, 1991; Whitfield, personal interview, December 7, 2016). Phillips explains how a piece, whether a book or a song, can be transformed to take on another meaning. Through choice, we can change an outcome. Whitfield emulates this idea of choice by setting out to turn a song filled with loneliness and despair into a song that rings with hope for the future course of HIV/AIDS.

Whitfield’s original piece was a song written and composed by Ugandan artist Philly Lutaaya, upon learning that he was dying of AIDS. Whitfield said she was drawn to the original piece because of the “raw emotion” the song displayed and the way in which “it shows the pull of two apparent forces”: one being the fear the singer is experiencing in his journey with AIDS and two being the responsibility the singer feels towards the future generations to come (Whitfield, personal interview, December 7, 2016). This piece, she claimed, enabled her to mold a song that sang of despair, into one that reflected hope and strength. Not just the strength to face an HIV/AIDS diagnosis, but also the strength to fight it for the generations to come.

To convey this new message, Whitfield juxtaposes the original song Alone in three keys ways: through the doctoring of the chosen displayed words, the intentional retention of the musical lines, and the portrayed image of two figures clasping hands.

The words that Whitfield’s art piece chooses to highlight places readers in an onward march towards HIV/AIDS solidarity, juxtaposing the original title Alone. To contrast some of the original works’ lines, such as “Out there somewhere/Alone and frightened” or “No more loving arms/Thrown around my neck”, Whitfield transformed the lyrics to “Out of the darkness let’s stand/We’ll save the world, take my hand” and “We’ll lead on together/AIDS we’ll fight” (Lutaaya, 1988).

Whitfield not only places the original piece Alone at odds with her work through the transformation of lyrics, but also through the design of her art piece. The title of her piece Let’s Stand, through the contraction, implies plurality, directly contrasting the title Alone. Whitfield appears to counter the idea of being alone through choosing to depict two figures in her artwork. Whitfield states that these figures with clasped hands are actually representing Phillips himself, as well as his brother who gave permission for the release of Phillips’ song after his death (Whitfield, personal interview, December 7, 2016). This design, coupled with the figures emerging together from darkness to light, further reinforces the idea that any narrative, even a piece of sheet music representing loneliness, can be reframed as a hopeful one.

Along with the pastel figures, Whitfield’s art piece included the retention of the original music lines, yet not of the lyrics. Through the inclusiveness of the music lines, yet the removal of the lyrics from this portion of the document, it appears that Whitfield has stripped the song of any past ill feeling and has instead used these lines to connect the two figures, illustrating harmony between them. Through the removal of the lyrics from underneath the music lines, it gives viewers the feeling that the both the figures in the art, and the viewers themselves, are offered an empty song to compose. This subtle component seems to bring together the artist’s inspiration for this piece: there is no statement, sentiment, or narrative that cannot be transformed. It’s just a matter of choice.

This art piece uses song as a medium for an HIV/AIDS narrative. Through the lyrical transformations and simplicity, yet underlying complexity of the overlaid art, Whitfield appears to give each onlooker an opportunity to strip clean their past narrative and give them the ability to compose a new, hopeful narrative.
